

Truist's $300M IOS Facility Shows Bank Appetite Is Sector-Specific, Not Broad

The deal signals that regional banks will finance specialized real estate when the sponsor and asset thesis are proven.

The most important number in Truist Bank's $300 million acquisition facility for Jadian IOS is not the loan amount. It is the lender. A regional bank writing a nine-figure credit facility for a specialized real estate sector in mid-2026 is not a sign that bank lending is back. It is a sign that bank lending is back for specific sponsors, specific asset types, and specific capital structures. The distinction matters.

JIOS, the industrial outdoor storage affiliate of Jadian Capital, secured the facility to continue acquiring IOS assets nationwide. The facility is seeded by 11 properties and provides ample dry powder for further acquisitions. Cooper-Horowitz arranged the transaction, which was heavily competed, according to Justin Horowitz. Truist has been an active lender in the IOS space. In July 2025, it teamed with BMO on a $344 million loan for Alterra IOS.

In October, it provided a $100 million refinancing for a Triten and TPG Angelo Gordon portfolio. This is not a bank testing a new sector. It is a bank doubling down on a thesis it already underwrites. The IOS sector benefits from structural demand: e-commerce, last-mile logistics, and the need for outdoor storage of equipment, vehicles, and materials. The assets are typically in infill locations with high barriers to entry.

The tenant base is often creditworthy. The cash flow is generally stable. For a bank looking for yield without construction risk or office exposure, IOS fits a narrow but defensible box. What the deal reveals about capital availability is more instructive than the deal itself. Regional banks are not broadly reopening their lending windows.

They are picking sectors where they have underwriting comfort, where the sponsor has a track record, and where the asset class has not been repriced downward. IOS qualifies. Office does not. Multifamily is being refinanced through agencies, not banks. Retail is bifurcated. Industrial warehouse is still financeable but the cap rate compression has stalled. The facility also signals something about JIOS and its parent, Jadian Capital.

Jadian raised over $2 billion for its second opportunistic equity fund in March 2025, 40 percent above its target. That equity base gives JIOS the ability to underwrite acquisitions with a long hold period. The Truist facility provides the leverage to scale faster than equity alone would allow.

The combination of a well-capitalized sponsor and a bank willing to lend against a specific asset thesis is the recipe for liquidity in this market. Who benefits? JIOS gets a flexible acquisition line that lets it move quickly on deals without sourcing new debt each time. Truist gets a relationship with a growing platform and a portfolio of assets that fit its underwriting criteria.

Cooper-Horowitz gets another data point in its IOS advisory practice. Who is exposed? Any lender that tries to replicate this structure without the same sponsor quality or asset selectivity. The IOS sector is not immune to vacancy, tenant credit risk, or basis compression. A facility like this works when the underlying assets perform. If JIOS overpays for properties or if demand for IOS space softens, the leverage becomes a burden.

What should the market watch next? The pace of JIOS acquisitions. The firm has already bought more than 70 properties in 2026. If the Truist facility accelerates that pace, it will test whether the IOS market has enough depth to absorb the supply without compressing rents. It will also test whether other banks follow Truist into the sector or whether this remains a relationship-driven niche.

The facility is not proof that bank lending is recovering. It is proof that bank lending is available for the right sponsor, the right asset, and the right structure. That is a narrower signal than many in the market want to hear, but it is the signal the market is sending.
